HON, CHARLES T. O'FERRALL.

The renomination of Hon. Charles T. It is a fortunate thing that Virginia can retain the services of so capable and distinguished a man upon the floor of Congress. For the immediate present neither she nor the South can spare him there. As long as the Republican party remains in control of the House, with power to concoct and pass every measure which their hostility to the Southern States shall suggest, it is well that the Democratic delegation should include as many men of the stamp of th should include as many men of the stamp of resources, strong, courageous, and agmen whom the people they represent are anxious to promote to still higher offices, although at home, and this disposition is

CONGRESSIONAL NOMINATION.

The precinct meetings which were held in this city Thursday night, to nominate in this city Thursday night, to nominate delegates to the Congressional Convention were not only very well attended, but owing to the very general interest felt in the Congressional nomination, on account of the importance of the Congressional elections in the fall, there was a larger attendance of representative citizens of every class than has been witnessed for a long time. It is only when the attendance is of this character that the precinct meetings can be properly considered an approximately fair and free method of selecting delegates. So far the utmost good feeling has prevailed between the supporters of the different endanced until the end. What the maintained until the end. What the mass of the Democratic party in this district is demanding is the nomination of the man who is shown unmistakably to combine in himself the most nûmerous elements of strength. Embittered rivalries between the candidates would excite not the slightest sympathy in the public mind, but would be condemned without reserve. It is a cause for congratulation, therefore, that the can'twass is proceeding upon a plane of generous rivalry, and upon this plane it should be continued to be carried on. Any other course would signify only the ruin of the can'twass is proceeding upon a plane of generous rivalry, and upon this plane it should be continued to be carried on.
